★ Inside Story

Undressing our models!

Model figures can be quite difficult to mold, especially when lifelike poses are required. Figures are normally cut into separate pieces (for example, torso, head, arms, legs) in order to gain the required level of detail. When soldier figures are wearing uniforms, fortunately the clothing can aid the molding process, with the cooling lines generally coinciding with the seams of garments. A typical example would be the shoulder seams on a jacket or shirt. However, most of the figures accompanying the 25-pdr Field Gun are in a state of undress due to the intense heat. With their shirts removed, there is no convenient place to impart the cooling lines. To overcome this technical molding challenge, the engineering team very cleverly adapted the molds so that the cooling lines circumscribe the biceps instead of at the awkward shoulder area. This smart solution means no dislocated shoulders for this gun crew, and they can still keep their shirts off to try and keep cool!

DRAGON CATALOG TIMECHART

Dragon is dedicated to producing model kits that cover every period of WWII, from the start of the conflict to the end. As the accompanying chart demonstrates, in recent years Dragon has made remarkable progress in providing a comprehensive range of 1/35 plastic model kits from WWII. While German vehicles feature prominently in the lineup, American, British and Soviet vehicles are also very well represented in Dragon's collection.

One giant leap for modelers

By putting man on the Moon, the Apollo 11 mission became one of the most significant achievements in the history of mankind. The event was indeed summed up in the immortal words of mission commander: "That's one small step for man, one giant leap for mankind." Dragon has conducted intensive research when creating its 1/72 scale collection of spacecraft models. This process included examining surviving craft as well as scrutinizing period photographs. When designing the Apollo 11 Lunar and Command Modules, for example, the team discovered that most model kits of this particular craft missed out the landing radar antenna on the ascent stage. Dragon has not only provided this critical element, but has offered it as a photo-etched item so as to make it true to scale. Even the tiny window on the spacecraft is cleverly rendered with an appropriate decal. Even the tiniest detail has been considered and incorporated into this Apollo 11 spacecraft.

Curvy bottom

Normally observers don't get to see the keel of a ship because it's always submerged, but generally an ocean-going vessel will have a flat plate keel. Upon closer inspection, the keel of USS New York (LPD-21) is actually of quite an interesting design. As the research team for this kit examined photos of this amphibious transport ship under construction in the dry dock, they discovered a convex profile that runs at the stern. Indeed, these San Antonio-class ships don't have a regular flat-hull shape. The kit engineers were thus careful to add the correct degree of curvature to the hull of this vessel. Now the cross-section of the 1/700 scale model has a curvy bottom, which is exactly what the original has!
